The big events of the day were the ceremonies around the cannon in the afternoon. E. Ridgley Simpson of Baltimore read the class history. Charles D. Orth of New York city, editor in chief of the Princeton Tiger, the undergraduate humorous publication, gave the prophecy. Thomas H. Armstrong of Katherine, Tex., made the presentation. Following this the exercises took on a more serious tone. Talbot T. Pendleton, the all round athlete, who is life president of the class, gave the presidential address and followed this up with a tribute to those members of the class who died while in college. Clay pipes were then passed to each man and they had their last smoke together, breaking the pipes by throwing them against the cannon.

The day closed with a concert by the musical clubs in Alexander Hall and the annual sophomore reception to the senior class in the gymnasium. More than soo persons attended the "prom." The list of patronesses contained the names of Mrs. John Grier Hibben, the wife of the president of the university. Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, Mrs. Moses Taylor Pyne, Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, Mrs. Thomas J. The seniors handed their hoops to the sophomores. As the seniors marched out under the arch, breaking it down, hoop by hoop, the sophomores received the hoops and reconstructed the arch under which the seniors passed.

Several class reunions which were held to-day will continue to-morrow. The class who can follow directions, said Dr. Stitt. their dances, clubs and libraries are trying to teach mothers and daughters, fathers and sons to take their recreation together. The ethical value of kindergarten play, he said, lies in the fact that neatness, obedience and cooperation are all taught through games, and a foundation for the cooperative work of later life is laid. The kindergarten child becomes the workman who can follow directions, said Dr. Stitt.

The Harlem Opera House has its com-cany busy this week with "The Boss." which Edward Sheldon first wrote for Holbrook Blinn following the political plays which were popular at that time. As a study of the rise to wealth and power of a more or less unscrupulous politician of a more or less unscrupulous politician there was an appearance of nature in the character. It seemed, however, as though the complete change of nature in the last scene was rather too much of a wrench to the probabilities.

At all events it proved that the author had not written his play by beginning at the final situation in which its kernel must lie. Nobody would claim that a dramatic situation could be said to exist in a sudden change of character. It was not the infantile wall of the hard old hero's grandson that made the play "Rutherford and Son" possible. That was the cause of the hero's complete change of heart, which was theatrical enough to seem a stage manager's addition to the drama. The hero of "The Boss" changes just as suddenly.

The company acted well and the audience took delight in the appearance of its
